CONTRASTS IN CITY LIFE. From the St. Louis Times,
Out of the sound of the voices,
Away from the noisy street,
Where the reveiler drinks and rejoices,
And the sidewalks bruss my feet;
I am waiting the car to bear me
To the city's outskirts grey,
Where my wife is waiting to hear me
Recount the toilsoure day.

I left her soon this morning, All night we had watched the durling, Such watch as parents keep.
O'er her feverish, childish prattle
Our weary evelids bent.
Thil the fever ceased its battle.
As the dawn with darkness blent.

Then with heavy beart I started To carn their duity broad, And I have todest all day sore-hearted With the fear our child is dead; Though none in the shop were braver To do the tire-some task, the hour! ah, for the favor! But 'twould cost my place to ask!

Now the car is moving slowly, filled with hearts that do not think Of the trials of the lowly. Who from their glances skrink. Fill take my sear by a banker. Who has gained chough to-day. To store if away to canker. Could she die: and I away?

The street cars thunder and rattle,
The lamp-jets fleck the street,
But sillent now is the prattle
That the father longs to greet.
He finds them alone in the cottage,
The mother and pale dead child,
With no one to heed her sorrow,
Or to hear her sobbings wild. They both then bent their gazing

And darkness drapes the place;

But while their hearts are bleeding.
